

South Regional Health Research Collaborative

Pioneered by Lishman Health

Fostering collaboration and community engagement in research design, methodology, implementation and translation of findings among South regional communities to capitalise on resources both now and into the future.

What do we mean by community engagement in regional communities?

South regional community members, consumers and key stakeholders will have an active and respected voice in shaping health research priorities in accordance with the health and well-being needs of their communities.

They will be actively involved in health research project governance, implementation and translation of findings to impact on the needs of their communities.

What are the priority areas for 2021?

- Identifying key research questions for Aboriginal youth health
- Demographics and lived experience of the ageing population in regional communities
- Optimisation of community care for regional people with life-limiting conditions
- Chronic disease regional mapping and data sharing project
- Local Government and community responses to mental health
